QUESTIONS PRESENTED

1. The City of San Diego (the “City”) held an election on an initiative proposing a special tax (Measure C) on the express condition and with the uncontradicted public understanding that a two-thirds majority vote of the electorate was required for its passage. The measure undeniably failed to garner enough “yes” votes to meet that threshold, yet after the votes were cast and counted, the City declared that the measure had actually passed by a simple majority vote. May a city change the outcome of an election by lowering the applicable vote threshold after the election had already been completed?

2. The Elections Code requires that a city council “declare the results” of an election on a ballot measure “no later than the next regularly scheduled city council meeting following presentation of the 28-day canvass of the returns, or at a special meeting called for this purpose.” (Elec. Code, § 10263, subd. (b); see also Elec. Code § 15400.) Here, the City Council waited a full year after receiving the canvass of the returns before declaring that Measure C had passed under a lower vote threshold than stated in the City Clerk’s certification. Does a city have the discretion to delay declaring whether a measure has passed or failed, and to contravene the official certification of the election results by the impartial elections official?

INTRODUCTION

This case poses a critical question about the fundamental fairness of elections in California: May a city conduct an election under one set of rules, disregard its ministerial obligation to declare the results of the election as determined in accordance with that set of rules, and instead — a year later, long after the votes had been counted and the results had been certified by the elections official — change the rules and reverse the outcome of the election?

For at least the last 66 years, it was clear that the answer to this question was “no.” As explained in Hass v. City Council of City of Palm Springs (1956) 139 Cal.App.2d 73 (“Hass”), “[i]t would be a fraud on the voters to rule otherwise.” (Id. at p. 76.) Indeed, the facts in Hass are almost identical to those presented in this case. The court in Hass ruled that when a ballot measure was presented to the voters as requiring a three-fourths vote of the electors for passage, the city council could not subsequently declare that the measure had been duly enacted by a simple majority vote, even if the three-fourths vote requirement were later determined to be unconstitutional and only a simple majority vote was actually required for the measure’s adoption. (Id. at pp. 75-76.) Yet that is precisely the result that the court of appeal sanctioned here: Even though the City ordinance submitting the measure to the voters, the ballot materials, and press reports all unequivocally stated that Measure C needed a two-thirds supermajority to pass, the court of appeal concluded that the City Council was entitled to change the applicable vote threshold after the election had been completed and to declare that Measure C had actually passed by only a majority vote. (Slip Opinion (“Opn.”), Exh. A, pp. 2-4.)

The Opinion thus not only directly conflicts with the decision in Hass but contravenes a foundational principle of election law: Election outcomes must be decided by reference to the previously adopted and publicly announced rules — i.e., the rules that were in effect at the time the election was held and the voters cast their ballots. Adhering to the “ground rules” established before an election commences not only ensures that the election results will be fair, but that the public will perceive the results to be fair and legitimate. Voters demand and place great trust in public officials to conduct themselves impartially and to apply the rules consistently, especially in the case of close and controversial elections. Now more than ever, violations of that trust cannot be countenanced.

That is particularly so where, as here, there is an obvious and readily available remedy. Were this Court to agree with the court of appeal that under the California Constitution, Measure C required only a simple majority vote for approval, the appropriate remedy is not to disregard what the voters were told when casting their ballots and to decide the election’s outcome based upon a different vote threshold than the one under which it was conducted, but simply to invalidate the results of the flawed election and to hold a new election under the proper vote threshold. As this Court has explained, “preservation of the integrity of the election process is far more important in the long run than resolution of any one particular election.” (Gooch v. Hendrix (1993) 5 Cal.4th 266, 278 [citation omitted].)

This Court should therefore grant the Petition for Review in order to secure uniformity of decision and to reverse the court of appeal’s clearly erroneous rejection of a fundamental rule of election law and due process.

STATEMENT OF FACTS

The pertinent facts are undisputed. Measure C was submitted to the voters of the City of San Diego at a special municipal election held on March 3, 2020. In the ordinance formally submitting Measure C to the voters in November 2019, the City Council unequivocally declared that “[p]assage of this measure requires the affirmative vote of two-thirds of those qualified electors voting on the matter at the Municipal Special Election.” (Ordinance No. O-21143, § 5 [reproduced in Appellant’s Appendix, vol. 1, p. 56 (“AA I:56”)]; accord, id., § 4 [AA I:54] [“the initiative measure requires approval by a two-thirds majority of the local electorate to be adopted by the voters”].) So, too, did the City-prepared ballot materials, which explicitly told San Diego’s voters that approval of Measure C required a two-thirds majority vote. (See Official Title and Summary [AA I:74].) Press reports were fully consistent with these representations, confirming to San Diego voters that Measure C would only be approved upon a two-thirds majority vote. (AA III:1128; AA II:933 [collecting reports].) As the City Council later acknowledged, the official representations of the two-thirds vote threshold were made “based on the City

Attorney’s Office’s determination of the legal precedent and usual practice in California at the time of submittal of Measure C to the voters.” (AA I:161 [parentheses omitted].)

The City Council’s position changed, however, once the ballots were tabulated and it was determined that Measure C had failed to obtain the approval of two-thirds of the electorate. On April 2, 2020, San Diego City Clerk Elizabeth Maland certified the results of the March 3, 2020, municipal election, explicitly stating that Measure C required “a two-thirds majority to be adopted by the voters” and confirming that the initiative had only received 65.24% of the vote total, thus falling short of the two-thirds supermajority threshold. (AA I:100.) But when it came time for the City Council to fulfill its ministerial obligation to “declare” the results of the election on Measure C as required by Elections Code sections 10262-10263 and 15400, it refused to do so. Instead, the resolution adopted by the Council merely recited the vote totals for and against Measure C. (Resolution No. R-312901 (“April 2020 Resolution”) [AA I:109].) The resolution acknowledged that “the City Attorney determined that Measure C requires a two-thirds vote for approval” and that “[t]his determination was reiterated in the ballot and ballot pamphlet,” but it stated that “there exists in California a split of authority as to whether a majority vote or a supermajority is required for the passage of a special tax by citizens’ initiative” (ibid.) — a reference to a preexisting “split” between two trial courts on one side and one trial court on the other that had existed since before the City Council placed Measure C on the ballot subject to a two-thirds vote threshold in November 2019.¹ The Opinion erroneously states that “the legal landscape changed between the time when the ordinance placed Measure C on the ballot and when the election occurred” (Opn., Exh. A, p. 25), but in actuality nothing in the legal landscape had changed between the submission of Measure C to the voters in November 2019 and the Council’s April 2020 Resolution.

Notwithstanding the City Council’s refusal to declare the results of the Measure C election, during the ensuing year, the City (and the public) proceeded as if Measure C had been defeated. No attempt was made to impose or collect the higher transit occupancy tax mandated by the initiative, to issue the bonds contemplated by the measure, or to take any other action

Despite this disagreement among trial courts in northern California, the City Council had submitted Measure C to the voters on the express condition that it “requires approval by a two-thirds majority” (AA I:54) because that was “the City Attorney’s Office’s determination of the legal precedent and usual practice in California at the time of submittal of Measure C to the voters.” (AA I:161 [parentheses omitted, emphasis added].)

to implement it. On April 6, 2021, however — 369 days after the March 3, 2020, election — the City Council suddenly adopted Resolution No. R-313485 (“April 2021 Resolution”), officially declaring that Measure C had been approved by a majority vote in the Municipal Special Election held on March 3, 2020. (AA I:163.)

Alliance then filed a writ petition and reverse validation action, challenging the validity of the April 2021 Resolution. (See AA I:33-187.) The following day, the City filed its own validation action, seeking the superior court’s determination that Measure C was duly enacted by a majority vote. (AA I:188-199.) Along with Alliance, three other parties — Respondents Howard Jarvis Taxpayers Association (“HJTA”) and California Taxpayers Action Network (“CTAN”), and Appellant Yes Committee (“Proponents”) each filed an answer to the City’s action, and the cases were consolidated. (AA II:387.)

Respondent HJTA moved for judgment on the pleadings and Alliance joined in the motion, seeking the superior court’s determination that Measure C was invalid because the City could not lawfully declare the measure to have been adopted by a majority vote of the electors more than a year after it had been submitted to the voters on the condition that a two-thirds supermajority vote was required for its passage. (AA II:927-949.) The superior court granted Alliance’s motion, concluding that the City Council’s April 2021 resolution “adopted a new rule and applied it retroactively to the election, effectively changing the outcome of the election.” (AA III:1128). The superior court relied on Hass, which held that “[i]t would be a fraud on the voters” for a city council to declare that a measure that was presented to the voters as requiring a three-fourths vote of electors to pass had been duly enacted by a simple majority vote. (Hass, 139 Cal.App.2d at pp. 75-76.) The superior court specifically noted that “[t]he Hass Court recognized the fundamental unfairness and threat to the integrity of the election process in conducting an election under one set of rules and then changing those rules to reach a different outcome after the votes have been counted” (AA III:1128), emphasizing that it is a “fundamental principle of election law” that outcomes are decided according to “rules that were in effect at the time of the election and under which the election was held — and that changing those rules after the election has occurred renders the election fundamentally unfair and constitutes a violation of due process.” (Ibid.) Moreover, the superior court ruled, “[t]he Council had no authority to delay its declaration of the result of the Measure C election or contradict the City Clerk’s certified results in that declaration,” meaning that “[t]he later resolution of April, 2021 which changed the result is null and void as a matter of law.” (AA III:1127-1128.)

The City and Proponents appealed. On August 11, 2023, the court of appeal issued its decision reversing the superior court and remanding the case for further proceedings. Specifically, the court of appeal concluded that special taxes proposed by an initiative, like Measure C, require approval only by a simple majority vote.² (Opn., Exh. A, pp. 10-17.) The court of appeal further concluded that applying a simple majority vote threshold for the passage of Measure C did not violate due process or render the election fundamentally unfair, despite the voters having been told that a two-thirds vote was required for the measure’s adoption. (Opn., pp. 17-27.) The Opinion also mischaracterized and ultimately reversed the superior court’s conclusion that the City Council had failed to timely declare the results of the Measure C election, compounding its violation of due process. (Opn., pp. 27–30.)

All five parties petitioned for rehearing, and on August 30, 2023, the court of appeal denied all of the requests. (Exhs. B & C.)

ARGUMENT

I. THE OPINION CONFLICTS WITH ESTABLISHED JUDICIAL AUTHORITY RECOGNIZING THAT CHANGING THE RULES OF AN ELECTION AFTER IT HAS CONCLUDED VIOLATES DUE PROCESS AND RENDERS THE ELECTION FUNDAMENTALLY UNFAIR

The March 3, 2020, election in the City of San Diego was conducted with the uncontradicted understanding that Measure C needed to secure a two-thirds supermajority for adoption. By upholding the City Council’s declaration that Measure C was approved by the voters despite falling short of the number of “yes” votes that multiple city officials, official city legislation, and the ballot materials all stated were required for its passage, the Opinion below stands in irreconcilable conflict with a heretofore uncontroversial and bedrock principle of American elections — that once an election is completed, officials cannot “change the rules of the game” by applying a new and different rule retroactively to change the outcome of the already conducted election. This universally recognized principle has become a ubiquitous feature of modern election law, having been applied in a variety of contexts by California and federal appellate courts,³ commended by election law scholars,⁴

³ See, e.g., Roe v. Alabama (11th Cir. 1995) 43 F.3d 574, 582 (“Roe”) [state court’s new interpretation of its absentee voting law after votes were cast violated due process]; Griffin v. Burns (1st Cir. 1978) 570 F.2d 1065, 1078–79 [due process violated when absentee balloting was disallowed post-election after it had been allowed in previous elections for years]; *Brown v. Posner, Breaking the Deadlock: The 2000 Election, The Constitution, and The Courts 159 (2001) [“Nothing is more infuriating than changing the election rules after the outcome of the election, conducted under the existing rules, is known.”]; Michael T. embraced by the U.S. Supreme Court,⁵ and even written into federal law.⁶

Hass, which is virtually on all-fours with the present circumstances, is a prime example of how this foundational principle of election law should operate. There, the ballots for an election on a proposed redistricting ordinance stated that a three-fourths majority vote was required for its passage. (Hass, 139 Cal.App.2d at p. 74.) The election was held on that basis, and the measure won a majority vote but less than the three-fourths supermajority. After the City Council declared that the measure had been rejected, supporters of the proposed ordinance sought a court order directing the Council to declare that the measure had Disasters and Terrorist Attacks (2018) 67 Emory L.J. 545, 590 [“Changing the rules governing an election after it has occurred also raises a serious threat of due process violations.”].

been duly adopted by a simple majority vote, arguing that the three-fourths vote requirement was inapplicable and unconstitutional, because both the Elections Code and the California Constitution require only a majority vote to adopt any initiative or referendum measure. (Id. at p. 75.)

The trial court denied relief, and the court of appeal affirmed, ruling that it was “unnecessary to decide” whether a three-fourths or a majority vote was required for the election because the vote threshold under which the election had actually been conducted — i.e., the three-fourths supermajority requirement — could not lawfully be changed after the fact. Even if an incorrect and unconstitutional vote threshold had been used in conducting the election, the mistake could not be rectified by changing the outcome of the election after the voters had already cast their ballots: “If it be assumed that it will be eventually decided that in such an election only a majority vote is required to put the ordinance into effect, the fact remains that the proposition was not submitted to the voters on that basis. . . . [T]hey were asked to vote on the basis that a 3/4ths vote was required, and the result of the election did not meet the requirement set forth in both the proposed ordinance and the ballot.” (Id., at p. 76 [emphasis added].)

In short, “[a]fter the election has been decided by the voters on the basis of the proposed ordinance submitted to them, the result should not be declared void by the body charged with the duty of canvassing the votes on the ground that a different rule should have been followed.” (Ibid.) Any other outcome, Hass recognized, “would be a fraud on the voters” (ibid.) because it would mean changing the vote threshold required for passage after the election had been conducted. (See also, e.g., Briscoe, 435 F.2d at p. 1055 [“Regardless of whether the more restrictive position of the Board was statutorily or constitutionally valid, the application of the new anti-duplication rule to nullify previously acceptable signatures without prior notice was unfair and violated due process.”].)

So too here. Official legislation submitting Measure C to voters stating explicitly that the measure would require a two-thirds majority to pass, and the City conceded that “the usual practice in California at the time of submittal of Measure C to the voters” was to require a two-thirds majority vote threshold on a special tax initiative. (Resolution No. R-313485 [AA I:161].). Even if the election on Measure C should have been conducted under a simple majority vote threshold, that was not the vote threshold under which the election was actually conducted. That a due process violation can still occur even when the “new” rule is legally “correct” appears to have been lost on the court below. (See Opn., p. 4 [“Because we conclude that Measure C was subject to a simple majority, it was error to grant judgment on the pleadings.”].) What the court of appeal should have done if it believed that Measure C was subject to only a simple majority vote — and what this Court should now do if it were to agree that a simple majority is the “correct” vote threshold — is invalidate the results of the March 2020 election on Measure C conducted under the incorrect two-thirds vote threshold and order a new election to be held on Measure C using the proper vote threshold.

The court of appeal found Hass to be distinguishable and inapplicable in the present case because, in its view, “Ordinance No. O-211433 [submitting Measure C to the voters on the condition that a two-thirds majority vote was required for its adoption] did not, like the citizen-created ordinance in Hass, establish an applicable law for the measure because the city council’s ordinance could not supplant the governing law.” (Id., p. 21.) The premise of the court of appeal’s analysis, then, was its assumption that an initiative’s proponents could “establish[]” their own preferred vote threshold for passage of the measure in the text of the initiative, supplanting the constitutionally mandated threshold. (See id., at p. 20 [“[I]nclusion of a voting threshold in the text of the proposed ordinance ‘establishes the applicable law for that measure[.]’”] [quoting Jobs & Housing Coalition, 73 Cal.App.5th at p. 517] [emphasis in original]⁷.) That is simply not the law, however, nor could it be. The proponents of an initiative have no more power to modify the constitutional vote threshold required for an initiative’s passage by including a different threshold in the text of the measure than a city council does by declaring a different vote threshold in the ordinance submitting the measure to the voters. If the Constitution requires only a simple majority vote to pass an initiative, then initiative provisions raising or lowering that threshold would be in conflict with the Constitution and “cannot be enforced.” (See, e.g., Howard Jarvis Taxpayers Assn. v. City of San Diego (2004) 120 Cal.App.4th 374, 386, 392; Newport Beach Fire and Police Protective League v. City Council of the City of Newport Beach (1961) 189 Cal.App.2d 17, 21-23.) In short, it was plain error for the court of appeal to distinguish Hass on the ground that “Measure C, unlike the ordinance before the electorate in Hass, did not state a threshold requirement for voter approval.” (Opn., p. 21.) This Court should grant review to correct this legal error and make clear that initiative proponents cannot “opt-out” of constitutional vote thresholds.

Moreover, the court of appeal’s focus on how the two-thirds vote majority was established for the Measure C election obscures the undisputed fact that the voters and campaigns were repeatedly informed that a two-thirds majority was required for Measure C’s passage — a critical point because such official pronouncements regarding the rules under which an election will be held invite reasonable reliance by voters and campaigns. (See, e.g., Bennett v. Yoshino (9th Cir. 1998) 140 F.3d 1218, 1226-27 [due process violation occurs where there has been “likely reliance by voters on an established election procedure and/or official pronouncements” (emphasis added)]; see also Roe, 43 F.3d at p. 581 [“We consider it unreasonable to expect average voters and candidates to question the Secretary’s, the Attorney General’s, and the election officials’ interpretation and application of the statute, especially in light of its plain language.”].) From the perspective of those voters and campaigns, it makes no difference that the text of the proposed measure itself did not state that a two-thirds vote was required for its adoption or that “Ordinance No. O-211433 was the city council’s ministerial act to place Measure C on the ballot.” (Opn., p. 21.) What matters is that they were officially told that a two-thirds affirmative vote was needed for Measure C to pass, and they reasonably relied on that official information to shape their election strategy and conduct.

It should not be difficult to understand the unfairness that results from changing the rules after an election has been completed. Imagine, if you will, that a recall petition had been filed against one of the Justices on this Court, and the Governor’s notice calling for the election declared that a two-thirds supermajority vote in favor of the recall would be required in order to remove the Justice from office. The two-thirds vote threshold was reiterated in the official ballot materials and was widely reported in the press, as well. The Justice and their supporters therefore reasonably believed that they only needed to persuade and turn out 34% of the electorate to defeat the recall. However, after the election was conducted and 40% of the voters had cast ballots against the recall, the Secretary of State determined that a Justice could be removed by a simple majority vote and declared that the recall had actually been successful.

Would anyone seriously contend that such an election was “fundamentally fair”? Yet that scenario is directly comparable to what happened here: The opponents of Measure C and the voting public were repeatedly and unequivocally told that all they needed to do in order to defeat Measure C was to persuade at least one-third of the electorate to vote against the initiative, and they conducted their campaign and cast their ballots based upon that official information; then, only after the votes were counted and it became clear that Measure C's opponents had secured the number of votes that they were told were needed to defeat the measure, the City Council declared that the opponents actually needed to secure a majority of the vote to defeat the initiative, and so Measure C was deemed to have passed.

Although the court of appeal questioned how the erroneous statements that a two-thirds supermajority vote was required for Measure C's adoption "would cause a voter not to vote against a measure" (Opn., p. 26 [emphasis in original]), Hass and other judicial authorities rightly recognize that changing election rules can impact not just how — but whether — individuals vote, as well as inevitably affecting how campaigns operate and decide how much effort or money to spend on the election.⁸ (See, e.g., Hass, 139 Cal.App.2d at p. 76 ["It may well be that many voters who were not entirely convinced as to the wisdom of adopting that ordinance were willing to agree to it in the event that [two-thirds] of the voters desired to make that change.”]; Roe , 43 F.3d at p. 582 [“We believe that, had the candidates and citizens of Alabama known [that a different rule applied] campaign strategies would have taken this into account and supporters of [the candidates] who did not vote would have voted absentee.”]; Brown v. O’Brien, 469 F.2d at p. 569 [observing that had the rule change been implemented prior to the election, “the candidates might have campaigned in a different manner” and “[v]oters might have cast their ballots for a different candidate”] [footnote omitted].) These considerations assume even greater significance in a low-turnout, special election like the one held on Measure C because the announced vote threshold is even more likely to affect who and how many opponents bother to turn out to vote; if opposition campaigns and voters think a measure needs 67% to pass and is unlikely to obtain that threshold, then they are less likely to turn out to vote than if passage only requires a 50% majority. Put simply, the results cannot be considered a true reflection of the “will of the people” when the people are given incorrect information regarding the vote threshold, as was the case here.⁹

⁸ The court of appeal also sought to distinguish Alliance's due process authorities on the ground that "[h]ere, no individual voter's vote was discounted." (Id., p. 24.) Although changing the vote threshold after the election has occurred may not literally "fail[] to count each vote cast" (ibid.), it definitely changes "how much" a vote cast against the measure counts by negating only one vote in favor of the measure instead of two votes in favor. That is, votes cast by individuals against the measure were in fact "discounted," so the due process principles discussed in these cases fully apply.

⁹ The Opinion suggests that it would “undo the will of voters” and injure “the citizens’ initiative power” to refuse to validate Measure C. (Opn., p. 29.) Alliance does not dispute that the right of initiative is highly protected under California law. But by the same token, the importance of the citizens’ exercise of the right of initiative does not justify disregarding other important due process and election law principles, such as the prohibition against a city retroactively applying newly announced

Compounding the aforementioned legal errors, the court below mischaracterized Alliance’s due process claim as merely concerning “misinformation occur[ing] only above the measure’s official title and summary and in the ballot summary” (Opn., p. 23), and it then proceeded to wrongly analyze Alliance’s claim under a framework reserved for the very different circumstance of post-election challenges to the accuracy of statements or omissions in the ballot materials regarding the substance of a proposed measure. (Id., at p. 22, citing Horwath v. East Palo Alto (1989) 212 Cal.App.3d 766, 777 (“Horwath”).) But Alliance’s due process claim is not and never has been that an alleged “defect” in the ballot materials incorrectly described the substance of Measure C or the effect of the proposed measure. Indeed, Alliance did not even contend that the ballot materials were inaccurate in stating that a two-thirds vote was required for Measure C’s passage at the time the election was held; that is what Appellants are now claiming. Rather, Alliance’s claim is that the Measure C election was fundamentally unfair because it was conducted under one set of rules (that required a two-thirds majority for passage), and those rules were then changed to produce a different outcome after the votes were cast and counted. That both types of claims rest on principles of due process and fundamental fairness does not mean that the same legal test applies.

rules to an already completed election. The way to strike the proper balance between protecting both the public’s interest in conducting elections that are fundamentally fair and the people’s right to enact initiatives by a majority vote would be to rerun the election on Measure C under the correct vote threshold.

Notably, Howarth quite reasonably sets a high bar for a due process challenge arising from a post-election objection to the ballot materials because, in that context, the challengers had the chance to raise their objections before the election. Given the availability of this preelection remedy, the law quite properly refuses to reward those who “sit on their rights,” fail to object to the ballot materials, and then seek to use an alleged defect in those materials as the grounds for invalidating a duly-enacted measure after the election has concluded. (See, e.g., Dement v. Pierce (1932) 122 Cal.App. 254, 259 [“equity aids the vigilant, not those who slumber on their rights”].) But Alliance could not possibly have raised its challenge prior to the election, because the essence of its claim is that the City violated the law more than a year after the election had concluded by purporting to change the applicable vote threshold from that which was (accurately) stated in the ballot materials. Alliance could not reasonably have foreseen that the City would apply a different vote threshold after the election had concluded. Instead, it was Appellants who could have — and therefore should have — challenged the ballot materials for Measure C prior to the election if they believed that the materials incorrectly stated that a two-thirds majority vote was needed for Measure C’s passage.

Moreover, conducting an election under the “wrong” vote threshold is far more than a garden-variety election irregularity on an “ancillary matter” (see Opn., p. 22), but rather constitutes a fundamental structural error that undermines the integrity of the vote and “directly affects the adoption of the entire ordinance.” (Hass, 139 Cal.App.2d at p. 76.) A vote threshold literally defines the difference between the measure’s winning and losing. Errors in such a basic “rule of the game” affect the entire framework under which the election proceeds, much like a structural error in the conduct of a trial (e.g., a biased judge, a violation of right to public trial) is so intrinsically harmful that it requires automatic reversal of a criminal conviction. (See, e.g., Neder v. United States (1999) 527 U.S. 1, 7; cf. Republican National Committee v. Democratic National Committee (2020) 140 S.Ct. 1205, 1207 [“[e]xtending the date by which ballots may be cast by voters . . . fundamentally alters the nature of the election”].) Conducting an election under one vote threshold and then adjudging the outcome based on a different threshold thus necessarily infects the legitimacy of the election. As Hass recognized, “[i]t would be a fraud on the voters to rule otherwise, after they have voted upon an ordinance submitted to them upon a definite condition.” (139 Cal.App.2d at p. 76.)

In sum, until very recently, there was no conflict among appellate courts in California that when a legislative body seeks to change the rules in the middle of the game — much less after it has already concluded — “the Due Process Clause would seem to deny legislative Lucy any lawful authority to pull an electoral football away from the Charlie Brown electorate after the election has already begun.” (Justin Levitt, Failed Elections and the Legislative Selection of Presidential Electors (2021) 96 N.Y.U. L.

Rev. 1052, 1071.) Now there is. Review should be granted to ensure uniformity on this essential principle of election law in California and to correct the lower court’s error-riddled Opinion.

II. THE OPINION REWRITES THE PROVISIONS OF THE ELECTIONS CODE REQUIRING CITY COUNCILS TO TIMELY “DECLARE THE RESULTS” OF AN ELECTION, IMBUING THEM WITH THE DISCRETION TO DECIDE WHEN TO ANNOUNCE THE RESULTS OF THE ELECTION

It is bad enough that the City Council purported to change the rules governing the Measure C election after the election had been completed, but the Council only compounded its violation of the law by waiting more than a year to “declare” the outcome of the election on Measure C, and then doing so in contravention of the City Clerk’s certification of the election results.

Reversing the superior court’s determination that the City Council had a mandatory duty to timely announce whether Measure C had passed or failed, the court of appeal concluded that the April 2020 resolution, which merely recited the vote totals for and against Measure C but did not indicate whether Measure C had been adopted or defeated, adequately fulfilled the City Council’s duty to “declare the results” of the election as required by Elections Code sections 10263 and 15400.

Specifically, the Opinion found that the April 2020 Resolution “technical[ly]” complied with the Elections Code “by including the total number of votes cast regarding Measure C, as well as those specifically for and against it, and in so doing it declared the numeric results of the election.” (Opn., p. 28 [emphasis added].)

The Elections Code, however, does not merely require the Council to “declare[] the numeric results of the election,” but to actually “declare the results” (Elec. Code, § 10263, subd. (b)) and to “declare the results of each election under its jurisdiction as to each measure voted on at the election” (Elec. Code, § 15400). By adding the qualifier “numeric” to the statutory text, the court of appeal contravened the plain meaning of “the results” of an election. According to the Opinion, a city council may comply with its statutory duty to “declare the results” of an election without declaring the one “result” that the public most needs to know: whether or not a measure was approved and adopted. Respectfully, that is an absurd interpretation of the statutory language and the manifest legislative intent.¹⁰

¹⁰ The Elections Code imposes the same obligation on the City Council to “declare the results” of candidate elections as it does for ballot measure elections. Immediately following this mandate in section 10263, subdivision (b), the statute states that the city council must “install the newly elected officers.” Section 15400 likewise mandates that “[t]he governing body shall declare elected or nominated to each office voted on at each election under its jurisdiction the person having the highest number of votes for that office” Both statutes, then, plainly contemplate that in “declar[ing] the results,” the city council must not merely recite the numerical tabulation of the votes cast in the election, but must actually declare which candidate won the election so that the winning candidate may immediately thereafter be installed in office (or be nominated for the ensuing general election). There is no legitimate basis for giving the phrase a different interpretation when used in the statutes to require the council to “declare the results” of a ballot measure election.

Relatedly, the Opinion belittles the concerns raised by Alliance in this regard, characterizing Alliance’s contention to be merely that the April 2021 resolution “came too late” and that the Court was being asked to “reverse the passage of Measure C based on the delay.” (Opn., p. 29.) Again, this is not accurate. Alliance’s argument is that the deliberate delay by the City Council in declaring the results of the election compounded the fundamental unfairness of the election by violating additional election law norms in a manner that exacerbates uncertainty and distrust of the entire election process. The public expects and is entitled to learn who has won an election as soon as the votes can be counted, and the longer there is no declared “winner,” the more the uncertainty and distrust threatens to undermine the public’s confidence in the integrity of the election. As explained above, because nothing in the “legal landscape” had changed between the submission of Measure C to voters and the date in April 2020 when the City Council was required to declare the results of the election — and because City Councilmembers were among the most ardent supporters of Measure C (see AA I:78) — it would be understandable for the public to think that it was the officials’ support for Measure C that led the City Council to delay declaring the measure defeated in the March 2020 election and to change its mind about implementing the two-thirds vote threshold only after realizing that the measure had fallen short of that threshold. (See generally Stanson v. Mott (1976) 17 Cal.3d 206, 217 (“Stanson”) [“A fundamental precept of this nation’s democratic electoral process is that the government may not ‘take sides’ in election contests or bestow an unfair advantage on one of several competing factions.”].) In countenancing the City Council’s refusal to timely “declare the results” of the Measure C election, the court of appeal only exacerbated the perceived unfairness of the election process. (See, e.g., In re Murchison (1995) 349 U.S. 133, 136 [“justice must satisfy the appearance of justice”]; Griffin, 570 F.2d at p. 1079 [“due process involves the appearance of fairness as well as actual fairness.”].)

In sum, by rewriting the plain text of the Elections Code provisions requiring the City Council to “declare the results” of the election, the Opinion adopted an Orwellian interpretation of the Elections Code that undermines the public’s confidence in the integrity of the election process. Review should be granted to correct this error, as well.

III. THIS DECISION ADVERSELY AFFECTS EVERY CALIFORNIAN, CASTING DOUBT ON THE LEGITIMACY AND FAIRNESS OF CALIFORNIA’S ELECTIONS

Prior to the events of January 6, 2021, it would have been easier to write off concerns regarding public distrust of elections as hyperbolic or speculative. But today, it is no longer inconceivable that a legislative body would attempt to contravene the certified election results, would apply a new and different set of rules to an already completed election, and would on that basis declare that the election’s apparent loser was actually the winner.

The City Council’s reversal of the City Clerk’s official certification of the Measure C election results and its belated declaration that Measure C was actually approved by a majority vote casts doubt on the legitimacy of the electoral process and undermines the voters' confidence in the integrity of their elected officials and their government institutions. Allowing the City Council, more than a year after the election was held, to hand victory to a measure that undeniably failed to receive the number of votes that the City itself had told voters was necessary for its passage communicates to the voters that the City's ordinances and ballot materials cannot be relied upon, that the ground rules established for an election are subject to change after the votes have been tallied, and that the official certification of the election results by the impartial elections official can be overturned by a political body. It is no wonder, then, that citizens might mistrust their elected representatives and the institutions in which they serve. After all, "the very integrity of the process rests on the assumption that clear rules will be established and that, once established, they will be enforced fairly, consistently, and without discrimination so long as they remain in force." (Brown v. O'Brien, 469 F.2d at p. 570.)

As the U.S. Supreme Court has explained, "public confidence in the integrity of the electoral process has independent significance, because it encourages citizen participation in the democratic process." (Crawford v. Marion County Election Bd. (2008) 553 U.S. 181, 197.) Yet it is unreasonable to expect average voters to sustain their confidence in the integrity of the electoral process when elective legislative bodies are permitted to perform a complete about-face on the election rules that they specifically expressed to voters and campaigns. As recent events have made distressingly clear, the public's perception of the legitimacy of the electoral process matters because the citizenry's trust in the legitimacy of electoral outcomes is vital to a functioning democratic society. When the rules of an election are altered after the election has been held in order to reverse the outcome and achieve a favored result, democracy suffers.

Adhering to the rule that election outcomes must be decided according to the rules that were clearly established and announced at the outset of the election has the added benefit of providing a bright-line rule that is understandable to the public and that reduces the opportunity for strategic litigants to generate uncertainty, which breeds public distrust. That is, “[i]n the age of distrust, legal uncertainty over election rules, never a good thing, is even more risky” because it creates openings for losing parties to de-legitimize the entire election process by asserting their preferred view of what the law “is and always was,” then claiming the election was compromised because “the law” was not followed. (See Richard H. Pildes, Election Law in an Age of Distrust (2022) 74 Stanford L. Rev. 100, 104.) Instead of minimizing legal uncertainty over which election rules should apply, the Opinion signals that voters and campaigns cannot trust City officials and cannot rely on their repeated representations regarding the “rules of the game.”

Allowing the lower court's published opinion approving the City Council's actions in this case to stand will only breed further mistrust of our public officials and of the fairness of California's elections, which in turn jeopardizes the willingness of voters to participate in democratic governance.

CONCLUSION

As we have painfully learned, the public must trust the electoral process in order to respect electoral outcomes. Solemn adherence to the established rules governing election procedures is a fundamental pre-requisite if election outcomes are going to be perceived as fair, accurate, and legitimate. Maintaining integrity in California's elections is simply more important than the outcome of any one election.

For the reasons set forth above, Alliance San Diego respectfully requests that the Court grant the Petition for Review.

INTRODUCTION

The City of San Diego (the City) placed a citizens' initiative, Measure C, on the ballot for the March 2020 general and special election. Measure C raises occupancy taxes on overnight lodging facilities within the city based on the lodging's location in one of three zones, and its revenues are designated for convention center upgrades, homeless services, and street repairs.

Ballot materials and the ordinance placing Measure C on the ballot (but not the text of Measure C) stated that Measure C required a two-thirds vote to pass, but by March 2020, at least two trial courts in San Francisco had concluded that citizens' initiatives, like Measure C, required only a simple majority. Measure C received 65.24 percent of the votes cast. In April 2020, the City adopted a resolution that stated the number votes for and against Measure C and identified that there was a split of authority about the voter threshold requirement for a citizens' initiative but did not state whether or not Measure C passed.

By April 2021, several appellate courts had concluded a citizens' initiatives required a simple majority, and the City adopted a resolution declaring that Measure C had passed. It also adopted several resolutions to authorize funding based on Measure C's terms.

Alliance San Diego (Alliance) filed a verified petition for writ of mandate and complaint for a reverse validation action, seeking a determination that the resolution declaring Measure C passed was invalid, and the City filed a validation action, seeking a determination its funding resolutions and its declaration that Measure C passed were valid. Several individuals and entities filed answers to the City’s validation complaint (collectively, the opponents).

The Howard Jarvis Taxpayers Association (HJTA) filed a motion for judgment on the pleadings, which the trial court granted. In its order, the court concluded a two-thirds majority voter threshold applied to Measure C; the failure to apply that threshold violated due process and constituted a “fraud upon the voters”; and the City failed to comply with its duty to declare whether Measure C passed immediately after the election, in 2020. The court entered judgment against the City.

The City and Yes! For a Better San Diego (Yes Committee),¹ which had supported Measure C, contend on appeal that a citizens’ initiative must receive a simple majority to pass. Thus, they contend Measure C does not violate Propositions 13 or 218, which require two-thirds of voters. They further contend the court erred by determining a two-thirds voter threshold applied to Measure C and by concluding the City’s application of a simple majority voter threshold violated due process or constituted “fraud on the voters.” The City and Yes Committee further contend the City did not violate the Elections Code² by delaying the announcement of the outcome of

² Statutory references are to the Elections Code unless otherwise specified.

Measure C, but if it did, the delay does not warrant invalidating Measure C. Finally, they maintain Measure C does not violate Proposition 219, and they contend Measure C is a citizens' initiative. They ask us to direct the trial court to grant them judgment on the pleadings.

We assume, as the trial court did, that Measure C is a citizens' initiative and conclude Propositions 13 and 218 do not apply to it. We also find that application of the simple majority voting requirement did not violate due process or constitute "fraud on the voters," even though ballot materials and the ordinance placing the measure on the ballot stated a two-thirds threshold applied, and that the City's delay in stating Measure C passed does not warrant invalidating it. We further determine that Measure C does not violate Proposition 219. Because we conclude that Measure C was subject to a simple majority, it was error to grant judgment on the pleadings. Thus, we reverse that judgment. However, these determinations are based on the assumption that Measure C is a citizens' initiative, and we find that the record is not sufficiently developed to consider the challenge to that assumption raised by affirmative defense in the California Taxpayers Action Network's (CTAN) answer to the City's validation complaint. Thus, we remand the matter for further proceedings.

II.

BACKGROUND AND PROCEDURAL FACTS

The ballot materials for the March 3, 2020 municipal primary election and municipal special election included Measure C, "Hotel Visitor Tax Increase for Convention Center Expansion, Homelessness Programs and Street Repairs." Measure C qualified for the ballot because it received a sufficient number of valid signatures from registered city voters to qualify as a citizen's initiative. It was promoted by a coalition of homeless rights advocates, civic and community activists, labor unions, and businesses.

Measure C proposed adding a new division 2, "Additional, Voter-Approved Transient Occupancy Tax and Related Bonds" to chapter 3, article 5 of the San Diego Municipal Code. Newly added San Diego Municipal Code section 35.0201, subdivision (a) would increase the city's occupancy tax applied to overnight facilities by between 1.25 and 3.25 percent, depending on the geographic location of the property. The highest increase, 3.25 percent, would be placed on visitors staying at facilities in the general vicinity of downtown San Diego. More central facilities would impose a 2.25 percent increase in the transient occupancy tax, and facilities at the far northern and southern portions of the city would see increased tax rates of 1.25 percent. Measure C would require the additional tax revenues be used for special purpose activities, defined as homelessness programs, street repairs, and convention center improvements, operations, support activities, and business development programs.

Measure C would also authorize the city to issue and sell bonds, to be repaid using the applicable allocated portion of the additional tax revenues, up to specific caps of maximum bond indebtedness. The bonds issued pursuant to Measure C would be limited obligations of the city and payable only from the additional tax revenues.

The substance of Measure C does not state a threshold requirement for voter approval. The voter information pamphlet stated above the official title and summary of Measure C that "passage of this measure requires the affirmative vote of two-thirds of those qualified electors voting on the matter." It described the measure as "the result of a citizens' initiative petition." The ballot summary stated, "[t]he measure authorizes a special tax, meaning the additional revenue is designated for specific purposes and thus requires a two-thirds vote for approval.” The city attorney’s impartial analysis explained that “[v]oter signatures qualified this citizens’ initiative measure for the ballot.” The remaining ballot materials, including the full text of Measure C did not address the voter threshold requirement.

The city council adopted Ordinance No. O-21143 on November 4, 2019. That ordinance placed Measure C on the ballot. Ordinance O-21143 states, “Passage of this measure requires the affirmative vote of two-thirds of those qualified electors voting on the matter at the Municipal Special Election.”

The election was held on March 3, 2020. The city clerk certified the results, stating that “for said proposition the vote was 239,024 (65.24%),” and “[a]gainst said proposition the vote was 127,349 (34.76%).” The Certificate of the City Clerk (Certificate) also stated that “the total vote was 366,373” and the “proposition requires a two-thirds majority to be adopted by the voters.” It did not state that Measure C passed or that it failed.

On April 7, 2020, the city council adopted resolution R-312901 (the April 2020 Resolution). The April 2020 Resolution stated that “declaring the results of a municipal election as certified by the . . . City Clerk is a ministerial act required by California Elections Code section 10263.” It also stated that there were 366,373 votes cast upon Measure C in the municipal special election, 239,024 (65.24 percent) of the votes were in favor of Measure C, and 127,349 (34.76 percent) of the votes were against Measure C.

The city staff draft resolution declared Measure C failed. The April 2020 Resolution that the city council ultimately adopted stated that (1) a split of authority existed in California as to whether a simple majority vote or a two-thirds supermajority vote was required for the passage of a special tax proposed by a citizens’ initiative; (2) the ballot and the ballot pamphlet stated a two-thirds threshold was required to approve Measure C; and (3) it was anticipated that the California Supreme Court would issue a final decision in the future that would resolve the ambiguity of the threshold requirement applicable to a special tax proposed by a citizens' initiative, a decision which could impact Measure C. It also explained that the statements on the ballot and ballot pamphlet that indicated there was a two-thirds voting requirement to approve Measure C were based on the city attorney's office's determination of the legal precedent and usual practices in California when Measure C was submitted for approval by voters.

By April 2020, two trial courts in San Francisco had concluded that a simple majority vote was required to pass a special tax proposed by a citizens' initiative, and one trial court in Fresno and another in Oakland had concluded that a two-thirds supermajority vote was required.

By April 2021, three appellate courts had issued opinions that concluded a simple majority vote is required to pass a special tax proposed by a citizens' initiative, and the Supreme Court had denied review of two of those cases.³ (Howard Jarvis, supra, 60 Cal.App.5th 227, review den.; City of Fresno v. Fresno Building Healthy Communities (2020) 59 Cal.App.5th 220, review den. Mar. 30, 2021, S266846 (Fresno); City and County of San Francisco v. All Persons Interested in the Matter of Proposition C (2020) 51 Cal.App.5th 703, review den. Sept. 9, 2020, S263753 (Proposition C).

On April 6, 2021, the city council passed resolution R-313485 (the April 2021 Resolution), which declared Measure C was approved in the March 3, 2020 election, based on the council's statement of the results in the April

³ The Supreme Court also denied review of the decision in Howard Jarvis Taxpayers Assn. v. City and County of San Francisco (2021) 60 Cal.App.5th 227, review den. Apr. 28, 2021, S267516 (Howard Jarvis).

2020 Resolution. This resolution superseded the city council's comments regarding Measure C in the April 2020 Resolution. The City also passed resolution R-313486, which authorized and approved the issuance and sale of homelessness program bonds. Also on April 6, 2021, the city council passed resolution R-313487, which authorized and approved the issuance and sale of convention center modernization bonds.

On June 3, 2021, Alliance⁴ filed a verified petition for writ of mandate and complaint for a reverse validation action (case No. 37-2021-00024590-CU-MC-CTL) challenging the validity of the April 2021 Resolution, which declared Measure C had been approved, and all the related actions subsequently taken as a result, including resolutions R-313486 and R-313487, addressing bonds. The City filed a timely answer on August 9, 2021.

On June 4, the City filed a validation action (case No. 37-2021-00024607-CU-MC-CTL), seeking to validate its authorization and approval of the bonds as detailed in resolutions R-313486 and R-313487, as well as any actions that could affect the validity of those resolutions, including the determination that Measure C was approved in the April 2021 Resolution.

The court in the validation action signed an order for publication of summons on June 21, 2021, and the summons and complaint were posted. Timely answers were filed by (1) HJTA; (2) CTAN;⁵ (3) Alliance; and (4) the Yes Committee. The first three answers denied the allegations and asked the court to invalidate Measure C. Yes Committee's answer supported the City's position that Measure C was valid.

On September 15, 2021, the validation and reverse validation actions were consolidated for all purposes.

HJTA and Alliance moved for judgment on the pleadings, arguing that the City informed voters that Measure C would require a two-thirds approval and improperly applied a simple majority. HJTA also argued that Measure C violated Propositions 13, 218, and 219. CTAN joined in the motion.

The court granted judgment on the pleadings. It determined that Hass v. City Council of the City of Palm Springs (1956) 139 Cal.App.2d 73 (Hass) was controlling and concluded that Ordinance No. O-21143 placing Measure C on the ballot was official legislation that established the rules of the election. Because the ordinance stated that passage of the measure required the affirmative vote of two-thirds of the qualified voters who voted on the matter, the court found that the City changed the rules after the election by reducing the required threshold to a simple majority. The court consequently determined that the adoption of the subsequent resolutions was fundamentally unfair and violated due process. The court also concluded the city council lacked the authority to declare election results without also declaring whether Measure C passed or failed.

The court entered judgment against the City on May 2, 2022, invalidating the April 2021 Resolution and directing the City to refrain from implementing or enforcing Measure C or any resolutions dependent on its passage. The City and Yes Committee filed timely notices of appeal.

III.
DISCUSSION

We review a judgment on the pleadings de novo. (People ex rel. Harris v. Pac Anchor Transportation, Inc. (2014) 59 Cal.4th 772, 777.) We also independently review trial court decisions about whether a tax meets legal requirements (e.g., Silicon Valley Taxpayers' Assn., Inc. v. Santa Clara County Open Space Authority (2008) 44 Cal.4th 431, 449-450), as well as due process questions (Severson & Werson, P.C. v. Sepehry-Fard (2019) 37 Cal.App.5th 938, 944.)

With respect to any factual questions, we review the motion for judgment on the pleadings to determine if a complaint states facts sufficient to state a cause of action under any theory. (Tarin v. Lind (2020) 47 Cal.App.5th 395, 403-404.)

A. Measure C Does Not Violate Propositions 13 and 218

The California Constitution was amended in 1911 to include the initiative power. (California Cannabis Coalition v. City of Upland (2017) 3 Cal.5th 924, 934 (California Cannabis). “The initiative is the power of the electors to propose statutes and amendments to the Constitution and to adopt or reject them.” (Cal. Const., art. II, § 8, subd. (a).)⁶ Viewing the initiative power as a power reserved by the people, courts liberally construe this right. (California Cannabis, at p. 934.) “When voters exercise the initiative power, they do so subject to precious few limits on that power.” (Id. at p. 935, citing Rossi v. Brown (1995) 9 Cal.4th 688, 695.) Thus, we “resolve doubts in favor of the exercise of the [initiative] right whenever possible.” (California Cannabis, at pp. 934, 936.) Further, “procedural requirements imposed on the Legislature and local governments do not similarly constrain the electorate’s initiative power without evidence that such was their intended purpose.” (Id. at p. 935.) This includes the constitutional requirement that the Legislature obtain a two-thirds vote before raising taxes (art. XIII A, § 3), a requirement that does not apply to voters’ initiatives (California Cannabis, at p. 935).

Proposition 13 added article XIII A to the state constitution.⁷ It contains four provisions. The first two “ ‘capped the ad valorem real property tax rate at 1 percent (art. XIII A, § 1)’ and ‘limited annual increases in real property assessment to 2 percent (art. XIII A, § 2).’ [Citation.]” (Proposition C, supra, 51 Cal.App.5th at p. 710.) The third provision “required that any increase in statewide taxes be approved by two-thirds of both houses of the Legislature.’ [Citations.]” (Ibid.; art. XIII A, § 3.) The fourth provision required “ ‘that any special tax imposed by a local government entity be approved by two-thirds of the qualified electors [citation].’ [Citation.]” (Proposition C, at p. 710, citing art. XIII A, § 4.)

Proposition 218 added articles XIII C and XIII D to the state Constitution. (Citizens for Fair REU Rates v. City of Redding (2018) 6 Cal.5th 1, 10.) These articles limit the authority of local governments to assess real property taxes and charges, as well as other methods to collect revenue not based on real property value or ownership. (Ibid.)

In Amador Valley Joint Union High School District v. State Board of Equalization (1978) 22 Cal.3d 208, the Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of Proposition 13. (Id. at p. 219.) There, the court explained that it liberally construes the power of initiative to promote the democratic process. (Id. at p. 219.) Consistent with this view, when construing the term “special tax,” a plurality of the Supreme Court in Los Angeles County Transportation Commission v. Richmond (1982) 31 Cal.3d 197 (Richmond), explained that the language of article XIII, section 4 should be strictly construed, resolving ambiguities “in favor of permitting voters of cities, counties and ‘special districts’ to enact ‘special taxes’ by a majority rather than two-thirds vote.” (Richmond, at p. 205.) The court described Proposition 13 as “fundamentally undemocratic” because it gave one group of voters a greater influence on an election’s outcome than another by functionally allowing citizens who oppose a measure to have their vote count double. (Richmond, at pp. 204-205.) The same year, the Supreme Court reiterated in City and County of San Francisco v. Farrell (1982) 32 Cal.3d 47 (Farrell) that “the language of section 4 must be strictly construed and ambiguities therein resolved so as to limit the measures to which the two-thirds requirement applies” when it interpreted the term “‘special district.’” (Id. at p. 52.)

The Supreme Court took this approach in Kennedy Wholesale, Inc. v. State Board of Equalization (1991) 53 Cal.3d 245 (Kennedy Wholesale). There, the court considered whether Proposition 99, a voter initiative which increased the tax on cigarettes and other tobacco products and allocated the revenue to tobacco-related problems, violated article XIII A, section 3, which had been added to the state Constitution by Proposition 13. (Kennedy Wholesale, at pp. 248-249.) The plaintiff argued article XIII A, section 3 permitted only the Legislature to raise taxes, but the Supreme Court held Proposition 99 did not violate article XIII A, section 3 because that section could “reasonably be interpreted not to limit that [initiative] power,” so Proposition 13 did not limit the power of initiative. (Kennedy Wholesale, at pp. 249, 253.)

Following the reasoning of Kennedy Wholesale, the Supreme Court in California Cannabis held that “article XIII C does not limit voters’ ‘power to raise taxes by statutory initiative,’ ” commenting that a different holding “would require an unreasonably broad construction of the term ‘local government’ at the expense of the people’s constitutional right to direct democracy, undermining our longstanding and consistent view that courts should protect and liberally construe it.” (California Cannabis, supra, 3 Cal.5th at p. 931.) Then, in Proposition C, the First Appellate District, Division Four compared article XIII A, section 4 to article XIII A, section 3 and followed the Supreme Court’s approach in Kennedy Wholesale to conclude that the two-thirds vote requirement in article XIII A, section 4 likewise does not apply to local initiatives. (Proposition C, supra, 51 Cal.App.5th at p. 715.) Explaining that courts have an obligation to harmonize potentially conflicting constitutional provisions when possible, the court indicated that article XIII A, section 4 did not mention and therefore did not restrict the initiative power, and it could not be repealed by implication. (Proposition C, at p. 716.)

To support its conclusion, the court in Proposition C explained that there was no evidence voters intended to limit their own power to raise taxes because Proposition 13 was directed at politicians and aimed to restore government to the people. (Proposition C, supra, 51 Cal.App.5th at p. 716, citing Kennedy Wholesale, supra, 53 Cal.3d at pp. 250-251.) It found relevant the explanation in Kennedy Wholesale that article II, section 10 “ ‘expressly provides that an initiative statute takes effect if “approved by a majority.” ’ ”

(Proposition C, at p. 717, quoting Kennedy Wholesale, at p. 251.) And it noted that the official Proposition 13 ballot materials did not indicate any intention to limit citizens’ ability to raise local taxes by initiative and to adopt the initiatives by majority vote. (Proposition C, at pp. 716-717.)

Finally, the Proposition C court noted that the Supreme Court has explained ambiguous language in article XIII A must be strictly construed to limit the measures to which the two-thirds supermajority requirement applies. (Proposition C, supra, 51 Cal.App.5th at p. 718; Kennedy Wholesale, supra, 53 Cal.3d at p. 252; Farrell, supra, 32 Cal.3d 47; Richmond, supra, 31 Cal.3d 197.) It found the principle that ambiguities must be resolved in favor of permitting voters to enact special taxes at odds with a construction of article XIII, section 4 that would expand the reach of the two-thirds requirement to voter initiatives. (Proposition C, at p. 718.) As the First Appellate District, Division Four later explained in City and County of San Francisco v. All Persons Interested in the Matter of Proposition G (2021) 66 Cal.App.5th 1058 (Proposition G), the terms “ ‘Cities, Counties and special districts’ ” found in article XIII A section 4 “must be construed to refer to these governmental entities exercising their power to tax through an elected board of public officials. The terms do not reach the electorate exercising its initiative power.” (Proposition G, at p. 1070.)

Like article XIII A, section 4, article XIII C, section 2, subdivision (d) does not reference initiative power. (See Proposition C, supra, 51 Cal.App.5th at p. 722.) Article XIII C, section 2, subdivision (d) provides, “No local government may impose, extend, or increase any special tax unless and until that tax is submitted to the electorate and approved by a two-thirds vote.” Article XIII C references “local government” and defines it to include “any county, city, city and county, including a charter city or county, any special district, or any other local or regional governmental entity,” but it does not reference the electorate. (art. XIII C, § 1; see Proposition C, at p. 722.) This definition of local government, which was added to the Constitution through Proposition 218, applies to article XIII C, section 2. (California Cannabis, supra, 3 Cal.5th at p. 943.)

Article XIII C, section 2, subdivision (d) must be interpreted in a manner consistent with article XIII A, section 4 because “ ‘Proposition 218 is Proposition 13’s progeny.’ ” (Proposition C, supra, 51 Cal.App.5th at p. 721.) Thus, like the court in Proposition C, we follow controlling precedent and conclude “article XIII C does not include the voting electorate.”⁸ (Id at p. 724, citing California Cannabis, supra, 3 Cal.5th at pp. 936-940.)

HJTA contends that the Supreme Court’s approach of strictly construing Proposition 13 was retracted in Rider v. County of San Diego (1991) 1 Cal.4th 1, 5 (Rider). (See Howard Jarvis Taxpayers’ Assn. v. State Bd. of Equalization (1993) 20 Cal.App.4th 1598, 1603.) In Rider, the sales tax at issue would have financed the construction and operation of justice facilities, but it did not achieve a two-third majority vote of the county’s voters. (Rider, at p. 5.) The San Diego County Board of Supervisors created an agency over which it retained control and discretion, created to avoid Proposition 13's two-thirds vote requirement. (Rider, at p. 8.) Evidence amply demonstrated the agency was an empty shell acting at the Board of Supervisor's fiscal discretion because the board retained substantial control over operations and expenditures. (Id. at pp. 8-9.) Thus, the Supreme Court concluded the agency was a "special district," whose tax impositions required a two-thirds majority. (Id. at p. 10.) It reasoned that the intent of Proposition 13 is to restrict the ability of local governments to impose new taxes to replace property tax revenues. That intent would be frustrated if local governments could arrange the formation of local taxing districts to circumvent it. (Rider, at pp. 10-11.) But Rider did not abandon the principles outlined in Farrell and Richmond that section 4 should be strictly construed and ambiguities resolved in favor of permitting citizens to enact special taxes by a majority rather than a supermajority. It did not apply limitations to initiative power; it evaluated whether local government acted to circumvent the limitations placed on it by Proposition 13. Moreover, as the court in Proposition G explained, there is "no conflict between Proposition 218's liberal construction clause and the maxim of Richmond and Farrell, that 'the language of section 4 must be strictly construed and ambiguities resolved in favor of permitting voters of cities, counties and "special districts" to enact "special taxes" by majority rather than two-thirds vote.'" (Proposition G, supra, 66 Cal.App.5th at p. 1072.)

⁸ HJTA warns that Proposition C’s holding allows government officials to circumvent Proposition 13 by acting as voters to qualify a citizens’ initiative with 10 percent of the registered voters and then adopting the initiative in their government capacity without any need for voter approval. (See § 9215 [permitting a legislative body to adopt an ordinance without alteration after initiative petition is certified as having 10 percent of the registered voters].) However, the City’s ordinance placing Measure C on the ballot stated that because the council did “not have legal authority under the California Constitution to increase a tax on its own vote, . . . [it] could not grant the initiative petition and adopt its provisions in full.” It further concluded that “initiative measures that seek to increase a tax must be submitted to the voters for approval[.]” Thus, it appears that the situation HJTA describes was not present here.

HJTA argues that case law following Proposition 13 and predating Proposition 218 confirmed an understanding that a two-thirds requirement applied to all local, special taxes, regardless of how they were proposed. To support this proposition, HJTA explains that citizens' initiative taxes failed for lack of a two-thirds approval in Altadena Library District v. Bloodgood

(1987) 192 Cal.App.3d 585, and it would likewise have failed in City of Dublin v. County of Alameda (1993) 14 Cal.App.4th 264 had the court determined the charge was a tax instead of a fee. But neither case questioned the application of Proposition 13's two-thirds requirement; they did not consider whether the two-thirds approval requirement applied to citizens' initiatives at all. (Proposition G, supra, 66 Cal.App.5th at pp. 1070-1071; see also Fresno, supra, 59 Cal.App.5th at p. 235 [issue of whether voters validly exercised initiative power not at issue in Altadena].) Altadena considered "whether Proposition 13's requirement that at least two-thirds of the voters approve new tax levies is constitutional as applied to a library district initiative," and Dublin contemplated whether the measure was a special tax. (Altadena, at p. 586; Dublin, at pp. 281-284; Proposition C, supra, 51 Cal.App.5th at p. 719.) We do not consider cases for a proposition not explored. (See In re Marriage of Cornejo (1996) 13 Cal.4th 381, 388.)

Instead, as we have explained, case law addressing this issue confirms that citizens' initiatives imposing special taxes need to be approved only by a simple majority. (Proposition G, supra, 66 Cal.App.5th at pp. 1070, 1075; Howard Jarvis, supra, 60 Cal.App.5th at p. 230; Fresno, supra, 59 Cal.App.5th at p. 231; Proposition C, supra, 51 Cal.App.5th at p. 715.) We, too, conclude that Propositions 13 and 218 do not apply to Measure C.

B. Measure C Required a Simple Majority Vote

Separate from their disagreement over the applicability of Propositions 13 and 218, the parties dispute whether the terms of the election set a two-thirds voter threshold for Measure C that the City violated. Alliance asks us to view the "official pronouncements" that stated a two-thirds majority was required to pass Measure C as controlling the election outcome, and HJTA suggests we focus on the "voter experience" to determine what the voting threshold was in this circumstance. The City and Yes Committee ask us to apply the law in effect at the time of the election.

Alliance urges us to follow the trial court’s lead and look to Hass for guidance. There, citizens proposed a redistricting ordinance, and when the city failed to act on the proposal, the Supreme Court held that the city council had a duty to either pass the proposed ordinance or put it to a citywide vote. (Hass, supra, 139 Cal.App.2d at p. 74.) The city then took the ordinance contained in the initiative petition and submitted it to electors, as directed by the Supreme Court. (Ibid.) That ordinance, which was drafted by the citizens, included a provision stating that “if three-fourths of the qualified electors voted in favor of the ordinance[,] it was to become effective, . . .” (Ibid.) The ballots likewise stated that “ ‘if three-fourths of the qualified electors, who vote, vote in favor of said Ordinance No. 293[,] it will provide for the redistricting of the presently existing councilmanic districts of the city of Palm Springs,’ in the manner described.” (Ibid.) When the ordinance received a majority of the votes, but less than three-fourths, the city council adopted a resolution declaring that the ordinance was rejected. (Id. at p. 75.) The plaintiff filed a writ of mandate to compel the city council to declare the ordinance passed because the law did not require a three-fourths majority vote for redistricting. (Ibid.)

The court of appeal did not reach the issue of whether the law required a three-fourths majority because “[t]he provision in the ordinance submitted at the election and stated in the ballots, that a three-fourths majority was required, [was] one which directly affect[ed] the adoption of the entire ordinance.” (Hass, supra, 139 Cal.App.2d at p. 76.) In other words, the substance of the citizen-drafted ordinance established the three-quarter supermajority requirement. Thus, even if the law required only a simple majority, “the fact remain[ed] that the proposition was not submitted to the voters on that basis. . . . [T]he matter was submitted to the voters in the form and subject to the condition requested by the signers of the initiative petition.” (Ibid.) Thus, the court of appeal concluded that the ordinance did not pass because the voting threshold contained within the substance of the measure was not met.

The City and Yes Committee direct us to Jobs & Housing Coalition v. City of Oakland (2021) 73 Cal.App.5th 505 (Jobs & Housing). There, a group of citizens placed a proposed special parcel tax on the ballot, and city officials prepared the corresponding ballot materials. The ballot materials “included statements that the measure needed two-thirds of the vote to pass.” (Id. at p. 508.) The city auditor’s materials also “stated the measure would go into effect ‘if adopted by two-thirds of voters.’” (Id. at p. 509.) The measure received 62.47 percent of the vote, but the city council adopted a resolution declaring that the measure passed and stating that there was uncertainty about whether a majority or two-thirds vote had been required. (Ibid.)

Plaintiffs filed a reverse validation complaint because the measure did not receive two-thirds of the vote. (Jobs & Housing, supra, 73 Cal.App.5th at p. 509.) They argued that because the ballot materials stated a two-thirds vote was needed, declaring the measure had passed constituted a “‘post hoc bait-and-switch’ that ‘creat[ed] a patent and fundamental unfairness that amount[ed] to a violation of due process.’” (Id. at pp. 509-510.) Plaintiffs there also argued that the city was estopped from claiming that a voting threshold below two-thirds governed the enactment of the measure. (Id. at p. 510.) Citing Hass, the trial court granted the plaintiffs judgment on the pleadings in part because “voters had been told that passage required a two-thirds vote, and allowing the measure to go into effect with fewer votes would amount to a ‘fraud on the voters.’ ” (Ibid.)

The Court of Appeal reversed the trial court. It “acknowledge[d] the critical importance of true and impartial ballot materials” and recognized that “voters are entitled to be given a true and impartial summary of initiative measures.” (Jobs & Housing, supra, 73 Cal.App.5th at pp. 511, 512.) But, distinguishing the measure from the ordinance in Hass, the Jobs and Housing court pointed out that the measure at issue, “unlike the measure in Hass, did not include a voting threshold in its text.” (Id. at p. 516.) It explained that “even accepting that incorrect statements in ballot materials might affect some voters, [it] disagree[d] that this possibility rendered the enactment of [the measure] a fraud on the voters.” (Ibid.) It further explained that the inclusion of a voting threshold in the text of the proposed ordinance “establishes the applicable law for that measure,” but “[a] voting threshold identified in ballot materials cannot supplant the law governing the applicable voting threshold.” (Id. at p. 517.) We find the opinion in Jobs & Housing persuasive, and we follow it.

The trial court here concluded Measure C was comparable to the redistricting ordinance in Hass and found that Ordinance No. O-21143, which placed Measure C on the ballot and stated the measure required a two-thirds majority, conditioned passage on a two-thirds majority vote. The recitals in Ordinance No. O-21143 explained the City’s understanding of the law at the time it adopted it, stating that Measure C was “a special tax, and thus the initiative measure requires approval by a two-thirds majority of the local electorate to be adopted by the voters;” Ordinance No. O-21143 also stated that “[p]assage of this measure requires the affirmative vote of two-thirds of those qualified electors voting on the matter at the Municipal Special Election.” The trial court viewed that language as “law of the City” because the city voted to submit Measure C to the voters via the ordinance.

But Ordinance No. O-21143 was the city council’s ministerial act to place Measure C on the ballot. (See Fresno, supra, 59 Cal.App.5th at p. 229 [commenting that the resolution submitting measure to voters stated a two-thirds vote of electorate was required ministerial act]; see also Elec. Code, § 9215 [requiring legislative body to adopt ordinance or submit ordinance to voters]; San Diego Mun. Code, § 27.1034 [requiring city council to adopt or reject legislative act as presented by initiative petition where petition contains signatures of 10 percent of more of voters].) Ordinance No. O-211433 did not, like the citizen-created ordinance in Hass, establish an applicable law for the measure because the city council’s ordinance could not supplant the governing law. (See Jobs & Housing, supra, 73 Cal.App.5th at p. 517.) Further, the ordinance did not incorporate the two-thirds vote requirement directly into Measure C the way the ordinance did in Hass. (Jobs & Housing, at p. 517.) Measure C, unlike the ordinance before the electorate in Hass, did not state a threshold requirement for voter approval; it required only “approval by the voters,” in section 7. Thus, we apply to the election of Measure C the voter threshold applicable to a citizens’ initiative, a simple majority.

C. Declaring the Passage of Measure C Based on a Simple Majority Vote Did Not Violate Due Process or Constitute “Fraud on the Voters”

Opponents argue the City violated due process because the election was conducted under one set of rules and the City then changed the rules after the election.

California courts “have recognized the “possibility” that an impartial analysis of a county measure or other ballot materials can be so misleading and inaccurate “that constitutional due process requires invalidation of the election.” ” (Jobs & Housing, supra, 73 Cal.App.5th at p. 512.) When there is an allegation that there are omissions, inaccuracies, or misleading statements in the ballot materials, due process “ ‘depend[s] on whether the materials, in light of other circumstances of the election, were so inaccurate or misleading as to prevent the voters from making informed choices.’ ” (Id. at p. 513, quoting Horwath v. East Palo Alto (1989) 212 Cal.App.3d 766, 777-778.) “ [C]ourts should take into account the materiality of the omission or other informational deficiency. Flaws striking at the very nature and purpose of the legislation are more serious than other, more ancillary matters.’ [Citation.]” (Horwath, at p. 778.) Considerations include the extent of preelection publicity, canvassing and other informational activities, the availability of the ordinance text, and the official dissemination and content of other materials, like arguments for or against the measure. (Ibid.)

In Jobs & Housing, the court applied the Horwath factors and concluded that the “ballot materials provided extensive, unchallenged, information about the substantive content and effect of the measure.” (Jobs & Housing, supra, 73 Cal.App.5th at p. 514.) There was no dispute that voters were given “true and impartial information about the substance of the proposed tax and how and where the proceeds would be distributed”; the “voting-threshold statements did not strike ‘at the very nature and purpose of the legislation,’ ” and instead concerned a “ ‘more ancillary matter [].’ [Citation.]” (Ibid.) The court also recognized the voting threshold statements occurred when there was legal uncertainty about the proper threshold for citizens’ initiatives for special taxes. (Id. at p. 514.) Ultimately, it concluded that the measure could not be invalidated on due process grounds, even though the ballot materials indicated the measure required two-thirds of the vote to pass, and the government later took a different position. (Id. at pp. 514-515.)

Like the appellate court in Jobs & Housing, we conclude the conduct here does not warrant invalidating Measure C. The opponents do not contend voters did not receive impartial information about the substance of Measure C, including where the proceeds would be distributed. (See Jobs & Housing, supra, 73 Cal.App.5th at p. 514.) They also do not contend the misinformation about the voter threshold struck at the measure's very purpose. (Id. at p. 513.) The misinformation occurred only above the measure's official title and summary and in the ballot summary. Moreover, the voter threshold statements here, like in Jobs & Housing, occurred when there was uncertainty about the proper threshold for a citizen initiative for special taxes because of trial court decisions on the issue. (See id. at p. 514.) Accordingly, we do not invalidate Measure C on due process grounds.

Alliance compares this situation to ones in which states have changed their method of counting individual votes after the elections were held, citing, among other cases, Roe v. Alabama (11th Cir. 1995) 43 F.3d 574 (Roe) and Griffin v. Burns (1st Cir. 1978) 570 F.2d 1065 (Griffin), which regarded the procedures for counting absentee ballots.

In Roe, an Alabama statute required notarization of absentee ballots for them to count, a procedure that had been acknowledged and followed for years. (Roe, supra, 43 F.3d at pp. 580-581.) The appellate court found the challenged ballots did not comply with the state law and including them in the count was contrary to the statewide practice, so it constituted a retroactive change in the election law. (Id. at p. 580.) It also implicated due process, disenfranchising those who did not vote based on the inconvenience of the notarization requirement. (Id. at p. 581.)

Griffin represented the opposite situation. There, Rhode Island law permitted absentee and shut-in voting in elections but did not explicitly apply to party primaries. (Griffin, supra, 570 F.2d at p. 1066.) Election officials believed the use of such ballots was authorized and supplied them for seven years before a losing candidate challenged their validity. (Id. at p. 1067.) The appellate court concluded it was unreasonable to expect a voter to question the state officials' issuance of the absentee ballots when no candidate or voter challenged the procedure before the election and the use of such ballots followed longstanding practice. (Id. at pp. 1075-1076.) Because the procedure induced voters to use the absentee method, discounting their ballots would have stripped those voters of their votes in the primary. (Id. at p. 1074.)

These cases are not like the one before us. The opponents do not contest the efficacy of the election here or otherwise suggests the City failed to count each vote cast. The City did not agree to count certain votes before the election and then exclude them once the election was over. Nor did it historically exclude ballots that failed to comply with election regulations and suddenly include them in the final count to achieve a preferred outcome. Here, no individual voter's vote was discounted. Thus, these cases are not helpful.

HJTA also addresses the possibility that the City's conduct here constitutes "fraud on the voters," a phrase taken from Hass. The Hass court commented: "Since the entire ordinance was rejected, the provision that the unconstitutionality of one part should not affect the remainder was not adopted. It would be a fraud on the voters to rule otherwise, after they have voted upon an ordinance submitted to them upon a definite condition." (Hass, supra, 139 Cal.App.2d at p. 76.) But the court there did not detail what constitutes “fraud on the voters” beyond ignoring terms contained within a measure that governed the election outcome. (Ibid.) This view assumes the ordinance itself, i.e., the substance of a measure, places a requirement on the voting threshold that is later dishonored. (See Jobs & Housing, supra, 73 Cal.App.5th at p. 516.) As we have explained, that is not the case here.

Jobs & Housing also addressed the theory of fraud found in Civil Code section 1572. Like HJTA, we are not convinced Hass’s reference to “fraud on the voters” was anything more than its concern that voters were asked to vote “on the basis that a three-fourths vote was required” but then evaluated the outcome on a different basis. (Hass, supra, 139 Cal.App.2d at p. 76.) But, if we were to adopt the same approach as the court in Jobs & Housing and consider whether the City engaged in fraud, we would be hard pressed to find an intentional misrepresentation, i.e., a statement of a fact known to be untrue by the person who makes it. (Jobs & Housing, supra, 73 Cal.App.5th at p. 517.) We agree with the Jobs & Housing court that the voting threshold statements “must be viewed in the context of the evolving legal landscape surrounding citizens’ initiatives for special parcel taxes.” (Id. at p. 517.) Given that context, like the Jobs & Housing court, we could not ascribe fraudulent intent to government officials because the legal landscape changed between the time when the ordinance placed Measure C on the ballot and when the election occurred. (See Jobs & Housing, at pp. 517-518.)

If intentional misrepresentation is necessary, HJTA asks us to adopt a different requirement for intent, offering a definition found in Evidence Code section 623. That section allows a conclusive presumption when a party’s statement or conduct intentionally and deliberately leads another to believe a particular thing to be true and to act upon such a belief. One case explains it as an estoppel in pais, which is a “rule [that] a person may not lull another into a false sense of security by conduct causing the latter to forebear or do something which he otherwise would have done and then take advantage of the inaction caused by his own conduct.” (Lovett v. Point Loma Development Corp. (1968) 266 Cal.App.2d 70, 75-76.) Even if we were to apply this rule, it is not clear how the City’s erroneous statement in ballot materials about the voter threshold would cause a voter not to vote against a measure.

We disagree with HJTA’s evaluation that Concerned Citizens v. City of Carlsbad (1988) 204 Cal.App.3d 937 (Concerned Citizens) is helpful to its position. In Concerned Citizens, voters were faced with two propositions regulating residential growth, Propositions E and G. (Concerned Citizens, at p. 939.) Proposition E contained a section that explicitly stated it was inconsistent with Proposition G. (Concerned Citizens, at p. 940.) After both propositions received a majority vote, the city council enacted the proposition that received the most votes. (Ibid.) Concerned Citizens argued that the two propositions were consistent, even though Proposition E stated explicitly that it was inconsistent with the terms outlined in Proposition G. (Concerned Citizens, at p. 940.) A panel of our court explained that the state Constitution and the Elections Code contemplate elections in which people must choose between conflicting proposals, and Proposition E gave voters notice of the conflict, which “assist[ed] voters in making an intelligent and informed decision.” (Concerned Citizens, at p. 943.) We refused to amend the proposition and strike the section stating there was an inconsistency because taking that action would have “disenfranchise[d] all those Carlsbad residents who voted for both propositions on the premise that only one would be enacted.” (Ibid.) Like the situation in Hass, in Concerned Citizens, the measure itself contained the limitation. In contrast here, as we explained ante, the substance of Measure C did not create any requirement that two-thirds approval was necessary.

D. Any Elections Code Violation Does Not Warrant Invalidating Measure C

Alliance contends that the City violated the Elections Code by “refus[ing] to ‘declare’ the result of the election” and delaying stating whether Measure C passed until April 2021.

Section 10262 requires the elections official to conduct the canvass, which is governed by sections 15302 and 15303. “Upon the completion of the canvass, the elections official shall certify the results to the governing body.” (§ 12062.) The canvass must be completed no later than the fourth Friday after the election (§ 10262, subd. (a)), and for a consolidated election, the city elections official shall certify the results to the governing body, and the governing body must comply with the applicable provisions of section 10263 no later than the next regularly scheduled city council meeting after the 28-day canvass or at a special city council meeting called for the purpose of complying with section 10263. (§ 10262, subd. (b).) Section 10263 requires the governing body to adopt a resolution that recites “the fact of the election and the other matters that are enumerated in section 10264.” When there is a consolidated election, the governing body “declare[s] the results and . . . install[s] the newly elected officers.” (Id., subd. (a).)

Section 10264 enumerates matters that the governing body must include in its resolution, pursuant to section 10263. It states: “As soon as the result of the election is declared, the elections official of the governing body shall enter on its records a statement of the result. [¶] That statement shall show: [¶] (a) The whole number of votes cast in the city. [¶] (b) The names of the persons voted for. [¶] (c) The measures voted upon. [¶] (d) For what office each person was voted for. [¶] (e) The number of votes given at each precinct to each person and for and against each measure. [¶] (f) The number of votes given in the city to each person and for and against each measure.” (§ 10264.)

San Diego Municipal Code section 27.0411 similarly requires the city clerk, immediately after the election to “cause a canvass of the election returns” and “certify the results of the canvass to the City Council, which shall have entered in its records the following: [¶] (a) The whole number of votes cast in the City; [¶] (b) The names of the candidates and the office each sought; [¶] (c) The measure presented; and [¶] (d) The number of votes cast for each candidate and for and against each measure.”

After the election was held on March 3, 2020, the city clerk certified the results, stating that “for said proposition the vote was 239,024 (65.24%),” and “[a]gainst said proposition the vote was 127,349 (34.76%).” Her certification also stated that “the total vote was 366,373” and the “proposition requires a two-thirds majority to be adopted by the voters.” The city clerk’s Certificate included all the components required by section 10263.

The April 2020 Resolution indicated the canvass of the election was completed and stated that the city clerk certified the results to the city council. It also stated that “declaring the results of a municipal election as certified by the . . . City Clerk is a ministerial act required by California Elections Code section 10263.” The April 2020 Resolution complied with the technical content requirements of sections 10262 and 10263 and San Diego Municipal Code section 27.0411 by including the total number of votes cast regarding Measure C, as well as those specifically for and against it, and in so doing it declared the numeric results of the election. However, instead of taking a position about whether Measure C passed, the resolution explained that “the City Attorney determined that Measure C requires a two-thirds vote for approval” and “acknowledge[d] that there exists in California a split of authority as to whether a majority vote or a supermajority is required for the passage of a special tax by citizens’ initiative It is anticipated that the California Supreme Court will issue a final decision in the future resolving this ambiguity, and that their decision may impact this Measure.”

In the April 2021 Resolution, the City declared that Measure C was approved in the March 3, 2020 election. Alliance contends the delay violated section 10263 because the declaration came too late. It asks us to reverse the passage of Measure C based on the delay, even though the law required a simple majority and the measure received more than 64 percent of the vote.

The opponents here could have challenged the April 2020 Resolution for failing to declare the outcome of Measure C, and they chose not to.⁹ This may be because, like the City, opponents recognized the changing legal landscape. It could be that the opponents were hopeful that appellate courts would conclude citizens’ initiatives require two-thirds of the votes to pass. Whatever opponents’ reasons for failing to challenge the City’s (in)action in court, we have concluded that Measure C, as a citizens’ initiative, was subject to a simple majority vote. We will not now undo the will of the voters based on a delay that resulted in protecting the citizens’ initiative power.

CTAN contends that Measure C placed authority to certify the passage of Measure C with the city clerk and not the city council, so the city council lacked the authority “to alter the City Clerk’s certification of the results” under the “law of the measure” and did not have discretion to declare it passed. Section 7 of Measure C states that “[u]pon approval by the voters,

⁹ Section 16100 provides six months to contest an election based on several possible problems with the election or with candidate eligibility, and it provides 30 days for other challenges. (See also § 16401 [contestant challenging results].)

the City Clerk shall certify to the passage and adoption of this Ordinance and shall cause it to be published according to law.” This means Measure C required the voters to approve it before the city clerk could certify its passage and adoption, but it does not state that the city clerk could determine whether the voters had approved it. Consistent with the Elections Code requirements, the Certificate provided the total vote, the number of votes and percentage of the total “[f]or said proposition,” and the number of votes and percentage of the total “[a]gainst said proposition.” It also stated, “This proposition requires a two-thirds majority to be adopted by the voters.” But it did not state that the voters had approved the measure or that it passed. Because the Certificate did not certify the passage or failure of the measure, there was nothing for the city council to alter.

Furthermore, as the City explains, the San Diego Municipal Code directs the city clerk to “cause a canvass of the election returns” and to “certify the results of the canvass to the City Council.” (San Diego Mun. Code, § 27.0411.) The canvass requires entry of the whole number of votes, the measure presented, and the number of votes cast for and against the measure. (Ibid.) Thus, the San Diego Municipal Code, like the Elections Code, vests the city clerk with the responsibility to certify the vote tallies to the city council, but it does not direct the city clerk to determine the legal effect of a vote. (See ibid.) Here, even considering section 7 of Measure C, the city clerk could not certify the passage and adoption of the ordinance or cause it to be published because the city council had not yet determined the outcome of the election.

E. Measure C Does Not Violate Proposition 219

The interpretation of a statute is a question of law, subject to de novo review. (Goodman v. Lozano (2010) 47 Cal.4th 1327, 1332.) We begin by looking at the language of the provision itself. “[W]e first analyze provisions’ text in their relevant context, which is typically the best and most reliable indicator of purpose. [Citations.] We start by ascribing to words their ordinary meaning, while taking account of related provisions and the structure of the relevant statutory and constitutional scheme. [Citations.] If the provisions’ intended purpose nonetheless remains opaque, we may consider extrinsic sources, such as an initiative’s ballot materials. [Citation.]” (California Cannabis, supra, 3 Cal.5th at pp. 933-934.)

Proposition 219 amended the article II, section 11 to add subdivision (b), which provides: “A city or county initiative measure may not include or exclude any part of the city or county from the application or effect of its provisions based upon approval or disapproval of the initiative measure, or based upon the casting of a specified percentage of votes in favor of the measure, by the electors of the city or county or any part thereof.”¹⁰ HJTA asks us to read Proposition 219 to require uniform application of a tax rate to all overnight facilities, regardless of geographical location. The City and Yes Committee concede that Measure C does not apply uniform tax rates to all overnight lodging facilities but contend that is not what Proposition 219 requires. They argue that Proposition 219 requires a government to apply provisions of a measure regardless of which regions approved or disapproved it in an election. Each position is supportable by the plain language in the proposition.

Highlighting the language that a measure may not include or exclude any part of a city or county from its provisions’ application or effect, HJTA focuses on the first part of article II, section 11, subdivision (b), which states, “A city or county initiative measure may not include or exclude any part of the city or county from the application or effect of its provisions based upon approval or disapproval of the initiative measure,” HJTA argues that Proposition 219 applies when the electors of the city “approve a measure which includes or excludes parts of the city from application and effect.” Thus, any time a measure applies differently based on geography, it violates Proposition 219. Instead, HJTA contends, a tax rate must apply uniformly to every portion of the city or county once the measure is approved.

The City and Yes Committee urge a different reading of the text. They explain that Proposition 219 prohibits the application or effect of provisions in an initiative measure from applying to only a portion of a city or county based on the measure’s approval or disapproval by electors in a portion of the city or county. They assert that an initiative’s provisions cannot be applied to part of a city based on which portion of the electors approved it, and it cannot be applied based on achieving a certain percentage of electors in a subarea of the city or county. Put differently, an initiative measure could include or exclude a portion of the city or county from the provision’s application or effect as long as inclusion or exclusion is not a consequence of its approval or disapproval by a portion of the city or county’s voters.

The City and Yes Committee also challenge HJTA’s understanding of Proposition 219’s language. They argue that reading a uniform geographical requirement into the proposition’s meaning ignores some of the proposition’s language because it does not consider the application or effect of a tax “based upon . . . [its] disapproval,” since a measure’s provisions would have no effect if disapproved. They also argue HJTA’s understanding fails to incorporate the phrase “by the electors of the city or county or any part thereof” because it would not matter which of a city's or county's electors approved or disapproved of the initiative measure or voted in a particular way if the only consideration is the measure's approval or disapproval. Thus, they contend, HJTA's interpretation fails to give meaning to all the words, treating some as surplusage. (See Agnew v. State Board of Equalization (1999) 21 Cal.4th 310, 330 “[C]ourt should avoid construction that makes some words surplusage”.)

Because the construction of the statute creates some ambiguity and our role is to effectuate the intent of the legislation, we turn to the ballot measure materials to aid us. The Legislature placed Proposition 219 on the ballot in June 1998. The Analysis by the Legislative Analyst explained how most ballot measures function “In most cases these ballot measures apply to all areas within the state or a local community in the same way. For example, if a statewide measure passes, it applies to all counties in the same way, regardless of whether a majority of voters in any individual county approved the measure.” (Ballot Pamp., Primary Elec. (June 2, 1998) analysis of Prop. 219 by Legis. Analyst, p. 6.) It identified a November 1993 proposition (Proposition 172) that enacted a statewide sales tax that provided revenues only to the counties that “voted in favor of the measure.”¹¹

In response, Proposition 219 would require a “ballot measure to apply in the same way in all parts of the jurisdiction (that is the state or a local government) affected by the measures, regardless of how any individual part of that jurisdiction voted.”¹² (Ballot Pamp., Primary Elec. (June 2, 1998) analysis of Prop. 219 by Legis. Analyst, p. 6.) The argument in favor of Proposition 219 described the November 1993 measure as “contain[ing] a provision to extort voters into supporting it” because “only those counties which voted in [the] hike would be able to receive the new police and fire protection revenues.” (Id. at p. 7, capitalization omitted.) It urged voters to support Proposition 219 to “prohibit political discrimination against the residents of a city, county or other local jurisdiction just because they voted for or against a particular ballot measure,” and because it would “guarantee benefits of all ballot measures [would] be provided fairly to the people of every community in California” and protect the rights “of California voters to cast their ballots without fear of political revenge, intimidation or blackmail.”¹³ (Ibid., capitalization omitted.) Thus, it is clear from the ballot materials that the purpose of Proposition 219 was to ensure that the way a particular county or city voted in a statewide election, or a portion of a county or city voted in a local election, must have no impact on whether a measure’s provisions apply to or affect that subarea. While HJTA concentrates on the first part of that calculus, emphasizing that measures must “apply in the same way in all parts of the jurisdiction (that is, the state or a local government) affected by the measures,” that is an incomplete view of the proposition, which was focused on ensuring that the way any part of a jurisdiction votes must not impact the measure’s application or effect. (Id. at p. 6.)

¹¹ It also pointed to a more recent, local measure that provided that if the measure were approved by a majority, it would enact a tax for general purposes, and if two-thirds of voters approved it, it would enact a tax for special purposes. Thus, a “yes” vote could mean two different things. (Ballot Pamp., Primary Elec. (June 2, 1998) analysis of Prop. 219 by Legis. Analyst, p. 6.) That example applies to the language in article II, section 11, subdivision (c).

Measure C creates three zones with three different tax rates. The highest increase, 3.25 percent, would be placed on visitors staying at facilities in the general vicinity of downtown San Diego. More central facilities would impose a 2.25 percent increase in the transient occupancy tax, and facilities at the far northern and southern portions of the city would see increased tax rates of 1.25 percent. Although Measure C applies three different tax rates to overnight lodging facilities based on their geographical locations within the city, the taxes are not influenced by which electors within the city voted in its favor. Further, the revenue from those taxes is also not distributed based on how parts of the city voted. Thus, whatever our views about the propriety of charging different tax rates based on the geography of an overnight facility within the city,¹⁴ we conclude Measure C does not violate Proposition 219.

F. We Remand the Matter for Further Consideration of Whether Measure C is a Citizens’ Initiative

1. Additional Facts

CTAN answered the City’s validation complaint with an affirmative defense that Measure C was a negotiated, sponsored, supported, and promoted city-sponsored initiative, so it was not a citizens’ initiative, and the two-thirds voting threshold applies. The primary basis of this argument appears to be that Jaymie Bradford was the executive vice-president and chief operating officer of the San Diego Regional Chamber of Commerce, as well as a principal organizer, proponent and treasurer for the Yes! for a Better San Diego campaign committee, while she was a member of the board of directors of the San Diego Convention Center Corporation, which is a wholly-owned subsidiary of the City. CTAN alleges that Bradford brought the resolution to support Measure C to the San Diego Convention Center Corporation board of directors, sought its approval, and voted to approve a resolution in support of Measure C. She also allegedly boosted for Measure C while holding herself out as a member of the convention center board. CTAN moved to depose Bradford and the custodian of records for the San Diego Regional Chamber of Commerce. The City moved to quash those depositions.

Bradford's name appears on the list of Measure C's proponents, incorporated into Ordinance No. O-21143, placing Measure C on the ballot. She indicated she was the executive vice-president and chief operating officer of the San Diego Regional Chamber of Commerce.

The trial court did not address whether Measure C is a citizens' initiative, and it did not rule on the motion to quash the subpoenas.

2. Analysis

We have assumed for purposes of our analysis in this opinion that Measure C is a citizens' initiative.¹⁵ CTAN challenges this assumption but asks us to remand this issue because "neither the merits nor any evidence or facts related to [this] affirmative defense are properly before this [c]ourt." The City contends that CTAN's position has been rejected in Proposition G.

¹⁵ We do not address Alliance's claims in footnote 4, which focus on arguments for why we should not direct the court to enter judgment in favor of the City, because they regard us directing judgment in favor of the City, an action which we do not take.

In Proposition G, the appellate court found irrelevant that the proposition’s proponents did not draft the ballot materials or fund the filing fees themselves, explaining the law does not prohibit a government from publicly expressing support for a ballot measure. (Proposition G, supra, 66 Cal.App.5th at p. 1081.) It found the argument that the official proponents did not play a sufficiently active role in securing the measure’s approval to be “nebulous and legally unsupported.” (Id. at p. 1082.) Thus, the fact of a government official’s involvement in an initiative does not necessarily convert a voter initiative into a local government initiative without more.¹⁶

But too much government involvement can mean an initiative is really presented by the local government. For example, in Rider, supra, 1 Cal.4th at pages 8-11, the Supreme Court considered evidence to evaluate whether an agency was really a special district, because tax impositions would then require a two-thirds majority vote. A panel of our court concluded there was ample evidence demonstrating that the San Diego County Board of Supervisors had acted to circumvent the intent behind Proposition 13 by establishing an agency over which it retained substantial control. (Rider, at pp. 8-11.)

¹⁶ We do not find Boling v. Public Employment Relations Board (2018) 5 Cal.5th 898 helpful. There, unions filed an unfair practice claim after the San Diego mayor refused to meet and confer with them regarding an initiative to eliminate defined-benefit pensions for new city employees, which the mayor drafted and promoted. (Id. at pp. 903-904.) The Supreme Court held that the Meyers-Milias-Brown Act (MMBA) imposes a meet and confer duty on the governing body and administrative officers or other representatives of that body. (Id. at pp. 917-918.) Because the mayor was the designated labor negotiator, he was required to meet and confer with the unions before determining a policy or course of action on issues that affected that terms and conditions of employment. (Id. at p. 918.) The mayor’s failure to do so violated the MMBA. (Id. at pp. 918-919.) The case was not focused on whether the initiative qualified as a citizens’ initiative.

From these cases, we understand that a government official’s involvement must demonstrate substantial control for an initiative to be deemed a government action rather a citizens’ initiative. Here, the record indicates there were several citizen proponents of Measure C, and the measure received the requisite public support to warrant placing it on the ballot as a citizens’ initiative. It is not clear whether Bradford’s involvement suggests her government agency retained substantial control over the initiative process or otherwise acted in a way that shows Measure C was not a “bona fide citizens’ initiative.” This affirmative defense is simply too underdeveloped at this point for us to reach the merits. Thus, we direct the trial court to consider this issue on remand.

DISPOSITION

The judgment is reversed. The matter is remanded to the superior court with instructions to proceed in a manner consistent with this opinion. The parties are to bear their own costs on appeal.
